“Legions were guided, some kicking and screaming in silence, to language by this most dedicated magistra, Nellie Agostino. Both teacher and advisor, she set the bar high in her classroom. Those willing to dedicate themselves to the hard work of learning were rewarded and encouraged. Although Latin and Italian are no longer taught at EHHS, for some of us, lifelong memories remain - even for those of us who barely made it through first year Latin. All knew how close she was to her cousin, Hartford's first female mayor, Ann Uccello. Later on in life we may have learned of the trailblazing steps it must have been to embrace education, and learning, as an Italian American woman, devoted to her church, her alma mater and making our society better as a result. Like the stone monuments in Canicattini Bagni, Nelli's life was itself a tribute to education, communication, language, poetry and, of course, religion. Better students than I should not hesitate to offer a far better praise than this, done with a reluctant reliance on website translation: "Magna luminaria sunt non extinguuntur." Hers is a great light which is never extinguished.

“ We were freshmen at East Hartford High just after Nellie came to begin her teaching career; an inspiration to the many, many students she influenced over the years with her dedication and knowledge. We grew to appreciate her wisdom more and more as we continued on past graduation into our later education and careers. Both of us continue to be enriched through that never-failing commitment to all she nurtured at that most important time in our lives. She was an outstanding educator and an unforgettable person.
